

Slavery and Anti-Slavery, 1490-1888

The most comprehensive archive available on the history of slavery

Slavery and Anti-Slavery is a digital archive in four series devoted to the study and understanding of the history of slavery in America.

Part 1: Debates over Slavery and Abolition

Part I: Debates over Slavery and Abolition is a scholarly collection of approximately 1.5 million pages of primary source documents shedding light on the abolitionist movement and the conflicts within it, the anti- and pro-slavery arguments of the period, and the debates on the subject of colonization. Assembling a wide variety of materials – monographs, pamphlets, manuscripts, periodicals and other documents – this new digital archive, developed under the guidance of a board of scholars, explores the various components of the debate with a focus on economic, gender, legal, religious, and government issues. By providing access to rare collections, until now only available in microfilm, this digital collection presents new research opportunities to scholars while the combination of types of materials exposes students to different approaches in the research process.

Additionally, a number of ancillary features – research guides, subject outlines and scholarly essays on the subject – will highlight the value of the content and assist users with access to the primary materials; introductory essays on sources will describe archival collections history and explain their research value. A subject guide search will allow researchers to submit searches against the database's subject vocabulary.

Editorial board:

Vernon Burton, Coastal Carolina University/University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Ira Berlin, University of Maryland

Laurent Dubois, Duke University

James Horton, George Washington University

Charles Joyner, Coastal Carolina University

Wilma King, University of Missouri-Columbia

Daniel Littlefield, University of South Carolina

Cassandra Pybus, University of Sydney

Chris Waldrep, San Francisco State University